TOOLS Alternative dispute resolution includes a series of tools, most commonly either mediation or arbitration, which parties in conflict can use to resolve their disagreements without going through the process of litigation.

RESOURCE US government's Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) is often used as an alternative dispute resolution resource.

FOCUS When bringing employees who are in conflict together, focus on how the conflict is affecting their work.

COMMUNICATION In the mediation process, the purpose of the mediator is to assist the parties in overcoming barriers to communication as well as other barriers that are keeping the parties from resolving their differences.

Facilitation is one of the major tools available to the mediator

As in most cases, an example will help you understand how a mediator might act in the role of facilitator

In this case, the mediator could step in and assist by acting as a facilitator of communication between the two parties.

CONTRACTS Many business contracts require the use of an arbitrator rather than seeking relief by way of the court system.

The most significant difference between the processes of mediation and arbitration is that the result of an arbitration process is binding on the parties who are in conflict.
